Today's PRF operation was outlined in a meeting at Alvorada

PRF targets irregular transport and reinforces its staff, especially in the North and Northeast regions

The action carried out today by the Federal Highway Police that takes place on Brazilian roads with actions that make it difficult to transport voters began to be articulated on the night of October 19th. That Wednesday, the hard core of Jair Bolsonaro's campaign met at Palácio da Alvorada and outlined the fundamental actions that should be taken in the final stretch of the second round.

One of them was precisely the operation that has been carried out since this morning: the heads of the bodies that assist the Electoral Justice, such as the Armed Forces, PF and Federal Highway Police, would be instructed so that their commanders were aware of the irregular transport of voters, especially in the Northeast.

Obviously, it was never a concern with the brand of impartiality.

The expectation of the Bolsonarista command has always been that only occasional irregular movements of Lula's voters would be barred, impeded or hindered.

Says a member of the campaign:

“You wouldn't even need to give an explicit order for anything. As the strength of these police forces is basically composed of supporters of the president, the consequence of such an operation is obvious.
